

The Fourth Noble Truth - Positive Morality - Pāramī

Bhante Bodhidhamma · A Foundation Course in Buddhism · 22:14

The Buddha taught that morality was the basis of spiritual attainment. By morality, he didn't mean a set of commandments imposed by a wrathful deity. He meant simply those rules whereby a harmonious society would be established and a peaceful and loving mind could be developed. Since all human beings are interdependent, an individual's progress through life is greatly affected by those around and about. Buddhism often talks about the kalyanamita, the good friend, and the Buddha himself is often seen as such – a friend, a companion, a true guide who has our best interests at heart.

The primary precepts are the basic guidelines. They begin with a negative morality, to cease from harm, then comes to do good, a positive morality, the development of virtue. This was codified in the Theravada tradition as the ten perfections. Actually, the translation gives the wrong idea as to their aim. The word for them in Pali is parami, which means the other shore, an image often used for Nibbāna. So really, these ten virtues, when practiced, help us to find our way to liberation. There's no idea of perfection in terms of coming to some sort of end in their development. They can be practiced and developed as long as we are alive, to any degree.

The ten perfections are generosity, morality, renunciation, wisdom, effort, patience, truthfulness, resolution, unconditioned love, and equanimity. Here we can only give pointers, and I'm sure none of the virtues comes to you as any surprise.

First, then, is dana, generosity. Dana is a word you will often hear in Buddhist circles. If the lay people offer food to monks and nuns, for instance, it's called dana. Dana means, really, to share one's wealth and one's time with others with no thought of return. Our word donation comes from the same root. This is very important because it teaches us to let go of our attachment to wealth and frees us from thinking that our lives are to be simply lived for our own personal benefit. It stops us becoming greedy and miserly.

Walking around the city centre on a flag day for a charity, do we ignore the change-jangling boxes? Do we instinctively reach into our purse? If we do, and find only a pound coin, do we still put it in? Or do we listen to the barrage of voices in our minds crying, too much, too much? Generosity with time softens our unwillingness to spend time for the benefit of others. Those precious moments of our lives we would normally devote entirely to our own pleasures and interests. How do we feel when children ask for help with homework? Or a parent asks for help? Or a friend makes a social call? Do we say, we're too busy, too tired?

Generosity with our wealth and time helps us to put our life, our life's work, our relationships into a greater perspective. The question arises, why should I give my money to another? Why should I spend any time of my life helping another? It is only in so doing and reaping the benefits that we can discover the answer.

The second is morality, which means to guard against any unskillful actions and to produce eventually a mind free of greed, hatred and delusion. This is one description of a Buddhist saint, the Arahant. Arahant literally means to kill one's enemies. What enemies? The enemies within. Greed, hatred and delusions.

The third is renunciation. Although this can often have a feel of sacrifice about it, that is not the kernel of it. It's being able to give something up once you know it's no good for you. We like to drink, but when we come to know what alcohol does to the body and mind, we may decide to cut back or stop altogether. Either way, renouncing drink means we have to go through the barrier of obsessive desires, the very habits of drinking. Often renunciation comes about because of weariness with some old habit. Perhaps a person stops drinking because she suddenly realizes it's just an empty social habit devoid of any intrinsic meaning. Renunciation includes having the strength of character to give up what is harmful to us.

Wisdom, the fourth perfection, means to undermine our delusions and illusions about ourselves. By the practice of awareness, both in meditation and during our daily lives, we can begin to see ourselves more objectively. As we do this, ignorance about ourselves is dispelled and wisdom, real self-knowledge, grows.

The fifth parami, effort, is raising the will to do, to act. It's raising the energy needed to accomplish the task. In the spiritual field, that means the primary precepts. We must make effort to cease from doing harm. We must put forth effort to do good, good for ourselves and others. We have to raise the effort to purify the mind. This constant effort to raise energy undermines our unwholesome tendency towards sleepiness, laziness, not bothering, leaving it to others, apathy. It won't allow boredom and depression to trick us into escape routes and hopelessness.

The sixth, patience, the Buddha said was the highest ascetism. The word khanti in Pali is variously translated as patience, forbearance or forgiveness. Our own word patience is interesting also. Its Latin root means suffering. Patience is the willingness to accept suffering. In our meditation, this is a virtue of great importance. When we sit, all our negative states of mind begin to surface, our great angers, grudges, depressions, anxieties, fears, doubts, and so on. All nasty feelings in the body, some very uncomfortable indeed. What is more, the pain of the sitting posture, especially at the knees, can become quite sharp.

Being able to sit still in the midst of this suffering is a prerequisite for insight wisdom. That attitude which says, yes, there's a lot of pain in me, I feel it, but I'm just going to sit here patiently, equanimously, and put all my effort into watching it keenly. This sort of attitude is absolutely paramount to the whole process of mental purification. Up until now, we've run away from pain, from pain to pain, either dousing it out with pills or finding some other way of distracting the mind. Anything but face up to it. But as the Buddha has pointed out so clearly in the First Noble Truth, this is but a foolish escapism. By facing pain and suffering, we lose our fear of it. When we see pain and suffering for what it really is, then we can say we have achieved an important insight into the human state, and it is this understanding that leads us towards our final emancipation from all suffering.

The Jataka tales comprise many volumes. They are stories made up after the death of the Buddha, purportedly telling of his past lives. Before his enlightenment, the Buddha is called the Bodhisatta, one who is seeking enlightenment. In this interesting little story, he is said to have been born an ascetic called Kundaka. It shows us how far patience can be taken. It would seem that the king Kalaka had gone with his dancing girls for a lavish picnic in a pleasure grove. He fell asleep and the girls wandered off to delight in the grove. They came across the ascetic Kundaka. They fell in conversation with him about the Dharma. When the king woke up and found out what had happened, he was furious with jealousy. But for the intervention of one of his favorite ladies, he would have cut the Bodhisattva down there and then.

Instead, maliciously, he asked the ascetic what he taught. The ascetic answered, "It is to have no anger when another abuses, strikes, or humiliates you." The cruel king Kalaka decided to put him to the test and had his executioner lash him two thousand times. When asked for his response, the ascetic Kundaka, the Bodhisatta, replies, "I teach patience, sire, but you think my patience is only skin deep. It is not. My patience is rooted deeply in my heart." The king then had his hands chopped off, then his feet. Again the ascetic declared, "You think, sire, my patience is in my hands and my feet, but it is deep within my being." Off came his ears and nose, but the ascetic Bodhisattva declared his patience was deep in the heart. Annoyed by his defeat, the king kicks him and departs, only to be swallowed up into the deepest of hells, the Ricci.

That same day, the Bodhisattva also dies, but not without this verse of forgiveness: "The king, who had my hands, feet, ears, and nose cut off, let him live long. Those who are as I am cannot be angry." So you see there's no limit to how much we can develop the perfections.

Truthfulness is the seventh. To strive for that absolute honesty, not only with others, but with ourselves too. It may take courage sometimes to face others and ourselves, but truthfulness means the inability to deceive. It means to search for the authentic, to do what is right and proper in our relationships, in our society and towards ourselves. It asks us to see things as they really are, warts and all. In its perfection, it's to seek the ultimate truth, Nibbāna.

The eighth is resolution. The path to hell is paved with good intentions. How true. If only we'd done this, done that, we'd be so happy now. Resolution is stickability – the stamina to keep going, going on regardless how hard it is, regardless of the temptations to leave off. It's to go on going on. The Buddha himself exercised this perfection when he made his historic decision not to rise from the sitting posture until he had attained enlightenment. What a resolution! It took six hours before his breakthrough came.

We can do it. We can take up the posture and refuse with all our will to rise not until we're enlightened. It would be a real test of our resolution, wouldn't it? This is one of the reasons it's so difficult to become enlightened. Our perfection of resolution is not developed enough.

Perhaps a little more realistically, it means to see our decisions through. If I decide to do something, I should do it. I should complete the task and complete it to the best of my ability. If I say I'll help someone with their garden, I should do it, and I should get there early, even if everything in me wants to go shopping instead. If I say I'm going to sit for half an hour, I should do so to the last minute and add a couple for good measure. This sort of self-training helps to develop a strong, unwavering mind.

This is not to be confused with a headstrong will-do-or-die business. It's a matter of honouring our commitments to others and to ourselves. It leads to self-reliance and to the trust of others. People know you do as you say, and you know you can do as you say you will do. Ultimately, it's all training us for that time when we will make our own personal historic decision not to rise, not to be dissuaded from the path, until our total liberation is won.

The ninth is metta. A difficult word this to translate. Loving-kindness is the usual, but some say it's too sloppy. It's an open-heartedness, friendliness. It's a universal, unprejudiced, unbiased, impartial love. Love as care, benevolence, empathy. There are no favourites. Even if someone dislikes us, we still develop this attitude towards them. If I dislike someone, and I want to practice metta, I first of all don't indulge that dislike. I develop first an attitude of no harm, and as the nasty feelings pass, I can begin to develop more kindly attitudes, looking at that person's better side.

Of course, this is all very difficult. We are bound to have a greater affinity, greater feelings for those who are close to us, those whom we meet every day rather than people we hardly know, let alone those we never see. But it's an ideal we aim to move towards, an unbounded love where all beings are seen through the eye of love and compassion. It's a generalized attitude, a disposition of care and well-wishing.

Someone I know held a correspondence with a prisoner, who later in a letter confided he had committed rape. My friend was filled with anger and disgust. In a letter later, the prisoner explained how through this terrible mistake he had lost all his family, no one wanted to know him, how he had lost his career, and all that on top of being locked away in prison. When my friend now saw it from the prisoner's angle, he was able to re-establish a sense of sympathy for the man. This is metta.

There is another side of metta which people find difficult to accept. And this is to realize that we cannot achieve the goal of universal love if we can't also include ourselves in there. That is why when we practice Metta Bhavana, loving-kindness meditation, we develop these attitudes towards ourselves. May I be free of suffering. May I be peaceful. May I be liberated. Some think this is selfishness, but there's a vast difference between eating to live and living to eat. The one is caring for oneself, looking after oneself. The other is self-indulgence.

We tend to have a lot of dislike for ourselves. We are often full of self-recrimination, self-accusations, all those little voices: I'm no good, I'm useless, I'm ugly, I'm disgusting, I don't know how anybody could possibly like me. I'm not good enough, no one loves me. And so on. We need to undermine these negative feelings towards ourselves by, first of all, not indulging them. Just listen to them and smile. No one's perfect. Then we should develop self-acceptance, self-care.

What would you think of someone who never washed their own clothes and went around like a ragamuffin? We'd say, that woman doesn't care for herself. That man has no self-respect. What would you think of someone who never washed their own clothes, went around like a ragamuffin, but wanted to wash everybody else's clothes? That's what we're like, isn't it? We like to take care of everyone else's problems while we haven't a clue what to do with our own. Sometimes we're so self-deluded we don't think we have any problems. Being able to take care of ourselves is a qualification for being able to take care of others.

Finally, equanimity, the tenth perfection. Equanimity is considered to be the highest state of mind in Buddhism. It is not to be confused with cold detachment or intellectual indifference. It is a mental state undisturbed by any negative emotions or feelings. There is no sentimentality here. It is a state of mind, clear, calm and cool like a still pool in which all the sky is clearly mirrored. It is within this equanimous mind that the intuition, the faculty of insight, can exercise its power to see, to understand and eventually to liberate the mind of all its illusions and delusions. It is when our hearts are calm and peaceful that wisdom shines.

The practice of meditation is especially important in developing this sort of mind. No matter what comes into our attention, we constantly take the position of the objective observer, just watching, just noting what is arising and passing away. Eventually all this commotion in the mind begins to die down. You can sometimes feel this relaxation, even after a few minutes sitting. As the mind's agitation calms, you may experience little gaps of empty mind, where there seems to be no emotion or mood or thought or image, just pure awareness, being aware of this stillness, this silence.

This is the mind as a calm pool, and awareness is the sky. When sensations, feelings or mental states arise out of the depth of this pool, the awareness can perceive quite clearly the arising and passing away of all this mental phenomena. It is with this sort of concentration that there is a possibility of glimpsing what is beyond this phenomena, the nirvanic peace beyond.

Now, in daily life, it's not necessary for us to get all neurotic and keep a tally on what perfection we're practicing and how well we're doing. The easiest and simplest approach to the development of virtue is to take one of the list which we feel we would like most to develop. We will find that in its practice all the others are included.

If I decide to practice dana generosity, for instance, well, of course, that means I'm undermining greed, and I shall hardly be developing the habit of taking what is not freely given to me. That's morality. As soon as I give, I also have to renounce a little of my wealth and time. Renunciation. As I practice generosity, I come to know its importance. I come to see how interdependent people are. Such insights are all developing my wisdom. To practice any virtue takes effort. And I need to suffer willingly my discomfort at the loss of wealth and time. That's patience. I've learnt how to give gladly.

In all this, I need to be honest with myself. I must be aware of my reasons, both overt and covert. Sometimes I think I'm giving with a pure heart, but in fact I'm very upset if the person doesn't thank me. Honesty might mean becoming aware of our impure motives. I develop resolution too, in that I carry out my decisions. In giving, my heart is opened. I'm giving because I see the other needs my assistance. I'm giving because I see no reason why I should have more than the other. This is metta, loving kindness.

All this naturally leads to undermining the negative attitudes I have in my mind, the negative feelings I have in my heart, especially if I give to someone I dislike. The clearer the heart and mind is of negativity, the greater is the equanimity. Through the practice of dāna, generosity, I am developing all the perfections.

It's important not to make heavy weather of all this, but rather to see it in the light of experimentation. When I decided to become a monk, I decided to give a ring away. It was a silver ring with a Buddhist design on it. I liked it very much. This was going to be a great act of renunciation. I decided I would give it away to the first person who showed any interest in it. As it happened, a young woman expressed a liking for it not a few days after my momentous decision, but I didn't think her worthy of it. Eventually, I did give it away, under those conditions, after a little self-examination and re-decision. I think my self-knowledge and wisdom grew a little there.

Our growth towards the light, away from the darkness, should be a joyful exploit. Our targets should be manageable. We should not make mission impossibles. If we aim too high and fail, it will only disappoint us. Growth in mental development needs to be slow and sure. We need to build up our perfections in depth. And that takes time. We need to revolutionize our thinking, but without violence. That revolution is the movement from doing harm to doing good.

We have to sit down every day and really examine our behaviour. We have to begin to do what's right. It's a bit like learning how to play a guitar. You struggle so long to twist your fingers round and get that chord. Then one day, there it is, a tune played with ease and delight. We need to see our bodies and minds as instruments we are trying to master through experimentation and practice. We need to develop into highly tuned, harmonious human instruments. This is our task, the purification and the development of mind. We can do it.

Well, I hope you found this talk interesting and helpful. May all of you be happy and peaceful. May all of you attain the nirvanic peace within.
