

Talk at the Re-opening of the Golden Buddha Centre in Totnes

Bhante Bodhidhamma · Dharma Talks · 55:22

Namo tassa bhagavato arhato samma-sambuddhassa — Homage to the Buddha, the Blessed Noble, and fully self-enlightened.

So, just to thank Vikram Daya for this opportunity to come and give a talk, and of course to thank them for the dedication that they put in to establish a little meditation centre right here in the middle of Totnes. Sadhu! Sadhu! Sadhu!

So I thought it might be an opportunity really just to go over some basic teachings as a reminder, just looking at the Buddha's life itself, recognising that he is an exemplar. The life that he lived is really what we ourselves have to go through. He's a teacher, of course, and in the sense that it's a path that everybody has to take, one way or the other. And I mean everybody. He's an archetype.

So it's a path of renunciation. Not to be confused with mortifications. So renunciation, remember, is just the letting go of a wrong relationship we have with the world. In those times there were, very similar to ours, two basic philosophies. One was just materialism, what we would call materialism, scientific materialism. One life and that's it, so you may as well enjoy yourself. And he probably tried that as a youth, got fed up with it, became empty, and that was one of the reasons that he began to leave. One of our deepest fears is that we want to enjoy life.

And the other one was that there was some sort of soul or spirit within us which was held down by kammā. And in the Jain tradition, this is quite material. It's your actual physical body, you might say. And the whole idea was to practise mortification exercises which would allow the soul to leave the body. So the Jain saint, the one who is a hero, is one who starves himself to death.

The Buddha himself tried these, of course. He tried to get into these beautiful mental states, which was part of the idea of some sort of eternality, and found them wanting. He kept waking up and finding himself to be still the depressed Gautama, anxious and depressed. And remember that he had this — we could say that he was going through what we would call an existential crisis, coming to terms with sickness, ageing and death. And then he tried the self-mortification business and found that it was just more suffering. So he abandoned that.

So we can imagine him on the road, having left his companions, feeling quite despairing. And along comes a woman — for some reason we know her name, Sujata, fortunate birth — who sees him, and although she's carrying special sweetmeats, little rice cakes, though I prefer to always think of it as rice pudding, and sees this poor wretch and offers her offerings to him. In the scriptures, of course, it says he was glowing like a god. This is ridiculous. So he was there looking quite wretched, and he took this rice pudding.

And, as you know, the effect of rice pudding is, of course, incalculable. At that point he has a memory from childhood, and this is really why we call him self-enlightened, because in this memory from childhood he remembers watching his father doing a ploughing ceremony. And he recognises that he's in the same state of absorption that he would have been in these practices of absorption of the jhānic state. But there's something extra to it, which is a sense of curiosity. So he's driven by interest to know what his father is doing.

At that point, his whole search, his whole labour turns upon itself. So instead of trying to seek happiness, he now tries to understand how he's creating suffering. And with that new inspiration, he sits under the Bodhi tree. And there's a great determination: either he's going to crack this problem or die. Well, lucky for him, and very fortunate for us, he cracks it. Six hours, that's what he said it took.

And what he realised, what he has experienced is something which he can't explain. He calls it ineffable, beyond rationality. He has all these lovely epithets, and he points to it often, or mostly, in the negative. It's not born, doesn't die, not conditioned. He then gives it a name, Nibbāna. But in the Theravāda tradition it's the negative side which is mostly accentuated. That Nibbāna is nothing that can be described, it's an emptiness and all that sort of stuff.

In the Mahāyāna they're much more positive about it and there are two occasions in the scriptures which, in a sense, give us the more Mahāyāna point of view. So we have a collection of scriptures called the Udāna Suttas which are the inspirational phrases that the Buddha came out with. So somebody collected them all into this special collection and it doesn't include these two instances. So it gives you the slant of a particular school.

These two instances say quite clearly that there is a consciousness which is not touched by any of the senses, which includes the mind. No emotions, no thoughts, etc. Without boundary. Only phenomena can create boundary. And in all directions full of light. Just this is the end of suffering.

So we have to find within us this Buddha. This Buddha that's within us, this satipaṇṇā, this intuitive awareness, is completely confused with the body and mind, with the psychophysical organism. And because of that confusion, it seeks happiness in this form. Seeking happiness in this form leads ultimately to frustration. And what it does is it makes us collect things to be acquisitive, thinking that the more we have, the more happy, the more secure we'll be. So more money, more friends, and more power.

And we find that this isn't ever completely satisfactory, because I'm never completely safe, so I always have to have a little more money. I'm never entirely loved, so I need a couple more friends. And I'm never quite in control, so I need a little more power. And so it grows, and in those actions we form unskillful deeds, which create within us our suffering, our conditioning, our unskillful conditioning.

Then one day we wake up and we discover vipassanā, or any meditation, and the process now is in reverse. The process is to observe within us how we've created this world. When we say we've created this world, the room we're sitting in now has, we can presume, some sort of objective existence. In other words, it can be here when we all leave. But the room that we're actually experiencing is entirely created by us. It depends upon our sight, our hearing, our body. And we live within this cocoon, this bubble of consciousness.

And this bubble of consciousness gives us the impression that we are objective about the world, especially in the West where we confuse ourselves into thinking that we can see the world objectively. It's thought about our science and our technology, but it's left us with a delusion. And what the meditation tells us is that the world we're actually living in is being created entirely by us from very minimal stimuli from the outside.

At the eardrum, all there is is pressure. At the skin level, there's only little chemical, electrical changes. The eyes collect a very small amount of photons, and the rest of it is completely manufactured within us. And so, when we consider that the world that I am actually living in is the one that I am creating, then the question must arise: Why have I made such a pig's ear of it?

And that's basically our investigation. In taking a stance within us, which we call the observer, the feeler, we have disengaged with the psychophysical organism. What do we mean by self? We mean identity. What does identity mean? It means basically that for that moment, that's what you are.

There are single moments where this comes across to us. For instance, when you trap your finger in the door, for that one lovely, delightful moment, you and the pain are one and the same. That's identity. When you get lost in a daydream and you're lost in the emotional inner DVD, that's what you are. That's what we mean by identity. As soon as you jump out of it, you've lost that identity and formed another identity of the one who knows.

The whole process of our liberation from that delusion is the process of pulling ourselves out of what we thought was me, what we thought was us. Consider the child who's born. We're told there was a lot of research done, even going back to Freud. There was a psychologist called Margaret Mahler, I think that was her name, who did extensive study on how a child finally individuated. And it takes, it seems, three years.

The first four months, it seems to be just a blanket of sensations which has no depth. So when we see little babies reaching out and actually creating their 3D world, and very slowly, over a period of time, this mass of sensations becomes the world out there and me. That's why by about the age of three, children could say, "I am a boy, I am a girl." They're very clear about their little existences.

All we are doing is externalising the inner world. All we are doing is, as it were, pushing away the inner world so that it becomes an inner world that seems outer. I'm sure I'm making myself perfectly clear.

So, when you find this position within yourself, it was very — it's been named the observation post by Nyanaponika Thera in what is still, you know, the classic book on meditation, The Heart of Buddhist Meditation. We access within us an observation post and we feel ourselves to be the observer of thoughts and feelings. We experience ourselves to be the feeler. We can feel pain in the knee and so on. We feel the breath. We can experience it directly. And yet, our identity is of the observer.

In the moments of real clarity within your meditation, when the body is perfectly still, and the heart is perfectly calm, and the mind has stopped even for a second, and you really feel yourself, you really experience yourself to be the observer within this psychophysical organism. When you've done that, ask yourself afterwards, what were the inner contents of the observer? What's it made of? Did you find any sensations in there? Did we find any bodily parts in there? Were there any feelings, emotions, moods? Were there any thoughts or images? And yet there was this bright, intuitive awareness.

So what we've done there, unwittingly, is we've found where Nibbāna is. It's staring us in the face, but we don't see it.

Now the sense of self that we get, the sense of the observer, is the image of that very satipaṇṇā in the screen of consciousness. When we talk about consciousness, when we talk about the viññāna, the heap, the fifth part of what we call the five aggregates, which are the body and its feelings, all our perceptions — sorry, all our feelings, physical feelings, emotions as feelings. All our perceptions, which congregate to become our memories and help our thought patterns. All our conditionings, our saṅkhāra, which is all our habits. And finally, this word, viññāna. It's translated as consciousness, but we don't really have a word for it in English, really. I tried to use the word cognition, but when I looked it up on the all-knowing Wikipedia, it didn't seem to fit either.

It's a screen. Can you imagine all the information coming in onto your monitor or your TV screen? And somehow it's got to be held. It's got to be manifest. That manifestation is the manifestation of consciousness. And, peculiarly enough, it has its own intelligence. Just as the body has its own intelligence. When you cut yourself, do you get in there? Do you shift the cells around? What do you do? You do nothing. You keep it antiseptic. And the body does the rest. The body itself, the cellular life, has its own intelligence.

So it is with our minds and hearts. We've developed a particular person, inverted commas, which works by itself. That's why you can be driving to work and thinking about all the problems of your life and arrive completely unharmed, having driven all that way, and you wonder where the two hours went. So there's something about the mind which has its own intelligence, but it needs to be put on the screen.

Our delusion is to fall into the screen, on the monitor, on the TV, and become whatever is happening at that time. When we come into meditation, we're pulling ourselves out of that mass, and we're making it an object. We're making it something to observe. And in so doing, as soon as we observe it, it obviously can't be me.

However, when we get there, and sometimes when you're watching television, you will see your image in the screen, and you have a choice. Are you going to watch TV, or are you going to watch yourself watching TV? So the sense of the observer is the image of this satipaṇṇā, this intuitive awareness in the screen of cognition, in the screen of consciousness, for want of a better word.

Unfortunately, you can't get rid of it by an act of will. And you can only get rid of it by paying attention to the object that's before you. When you pay attention to the object that's before you, you're going to absorb into it. Depending on the intention with which you enter that absorption, you come out the other end having developed that intention. If you saw something which you particularly liked, ice cream on a hot day, and you just went for it, and thoroughly indulged in it with two cones, you would come out of that experience with even more desire for ice cream.

However, if you went into that experience without the greed, but just to enjoy, very difficult to separate, then you come out of it with a greater sense of enjoyment without the attachment. We find we wouldn't get attached so much to things if we began to recognise the aftermath. The aftermath of attachment, the aftermath of indulgence is the frustration of not being able to get what you want. It's the grief of losing what you have. It's the constant fear of loss anyway, so you take out an insurance policy. There's a sense of compulsive behaviour behind it, and worst of all, boredom.

Because of the inbuilt obsolescence of pleasure, we can't keep chewing the same sweet. We've got to have a different flavour. And so we get caught up in this search for happiness in the sensual world, the search for happiness in relationship, the search for happiness in art, in nature, wherever we think we can find happiness, the search goes on.

However, if we begin to enter into these experiences with the right intention, then we don't get that stickiness, and we find that we can enjoy life without these unfortunate consequences. Conversely, if we enter into a situation of aversion, then of course we end up with conflict. And that has its own problems. Pretty straightforward.

So our aim in daily life is to take the aversion, to take the suffering out of pain, all sorts of pain — physical, emotional, relationship, whatever — take the suffering out of it, and to take the indulgence out of pleasure. That's our practice, in one way of looking at it, in ordinary daily life.

In the inner life, in our meditation and in our contemplations, our process is always to make things something to observe, something to investigate. And that process makes more and more obvious to us this quality within us which is happily called the knowing. So Ajahn Chah, who was a very famous monk in Thailand, lived up on the Mekong River, was considered to be an Arahant, and when he died, two million people turned up to his funeral, so presumably he earned his reputation. And he had this lovely little phrase of saying, "Make it simple, take it easy, stay with the one who knows." And that was probably his guiding line, which brought him his own insights.

So, this process of re-identifying ourselves backward into the observer is the process of relief. It's the process of unshackling ourselves. So Nibbāna turns out to be the unshackling of this intuitive awareness. That's the process that we're going through. And we can only hope that when we get there, that's it, and there isn't anything else.

I can only hope my words have been of some assistance. May you, by your fierce practice, enter into that wonderful state of the end of suffering sooner rather than later.

What happens now then? I hope you come again. And let's have a cup of tea. What about that? Is that a good thing? Questions and answers? Questions? Yeah, that's a question.

I don't have one. I didn't quite catch what you said about what happened to the Buddha when he ate a rice cake.

Well, what I'm suggesting is that sometime around that point, he remembers this occasion in childhood. So there must have been some connection with, you know, like Proust, the Madeleine. I mean, it all comes back to him, you know. So he remembers his father, and he just recalls that state. Now, if you think about children, you'll notice how they suddenly lock onto something, a bug they haven't seen or something. And when they do that, their eyes just lock and the world disappears. And their jaw drops.

And to us, more developed beings, we think they look gormless. We give them a crack on the back of the head and they wake up. Thereby destroying their ability to become fully liberated. This is what happens.

When the child is locked in like that, there's no thought. Their attention is completely absorbed in receiving the information. When the jaw drops it tells us that there's no thought, because the jaw, the tongue are intimately connected to thinking. So at that point they are in a state of pure observation. That's what we need to get back to. That's original mind.

So Buddha had that memory of his father. And having that memory of his father led him to... right, he turned around upon his meditation. He turned around on his meditation? Right, I'm putting it that way.

Before, he'd been practicing in order to be happy. So the first practices were these absorption states, which are, in all religions... something that you've created within yourself through mantra, through the practice of metta that we do. The beauty of those is that you don't need anything outside you. So therefore, all you need is a couple of robes, a tree, a bowl to go around and get a bit of food, and you can sit there all day completely blissed out. But unfortunately you kept waking up out of that state, and finding that actually you're still depressed, anxious... so it was a false state that happened. And he left those teachers because of that.

The other side was self-mortification, which is the idea that if you could release, if you could get rid of the... the problem was the body. So you got rid of all sex, drugs, rock and roll. You began not to eat, to draw the body down to its essentials. And as I've said, the Jains actually take it to the point of death after release, and for them, for the Jain religion, they are heroes.

He tried that, but he just found it to be more suffering. So, he then, has this experience. As far as I'm concerned, he's in a state of despair, because he's received all the teachings that were there, and he's still in a state of complete confusion and quandary, and presumably thinking that, well, this is it. It's just going to be birth after birth, one lifetime a cow and a pig, which sounds pretty miserable.

So he's sitting there and then somebody comes along, gives him this bit of rice, this sweetmeat, and he has this memory and somehow it changes his view of what he's trying to seek, of what he's searching for. So instead of trying to seek happiness, he says, well, why am I suffering? What's the cause of this suffering?

And it's that which makes him sit under the tree with this new inspiration of turning inward and observing how he's creating suffering. And this later comes out in the teaching of dependent origination, which is a psychology. And the teaching of dependent origination clearly delineates where the problem lies. It does not lie in the body. It does not lie in our sense bases. It does not lie in the feelings and emotions that come up. It lies in our relationship to what we're experiencing. That's the core of it. And that relationship is desire. Wrong desire.

But even at the point of desire, in the meditation, you'll know that there's no suffering. Because desire, as it comes up as an intention, is still not manifest. It just remains as a force within the mind. It's only when you fall into the identity of it that the suffering begins.

So the process is the seeing, the initial experience, the way that we divide the world into what's pleasant and unpleasant, and then the desire for the pleasant, and then I want the desire for the pleasant. So although in English we say I want, I see, want, I scream, it's the other way around. I scream, see, want, I. If it weren't that way around, there'd be no escape. If the whole process began with I, you wouldn't be able to get out of it, because it's always you. It's the fact that the process is before the I arises, is not you, is not identifiable, and you can step out of that process and observe it, and it's passing. And in so doing, you're actually seeing the escape route from suffering.

If you haven't understood this in the words, then you must come up to Satipaṇṇā and do a retreat.

So really then what you're saying is our real eye is our spiritual nature?

Yeah. Why not?

You're also saying not to take it personally, in a sense, aren't you? Because it's not about the eye.

Well, you have to be careful with this one, because the Buddha never said there was no self. He just said it was false. And it's recognizing the false nature of the self, which is the process of disidentifying. So whenever I say, I am depressed, where's the escape? As soon as I say, oh, there's depression, I've escaped. I've come out of that process of identity. See? Except the depression remains.

I know it's a drag. Everything changes. Remember that the heart will heal itself. You don't have to do anything. This is the magic of the whole system. All there is, is energy. It's the mind which describes it as depression and puts a history to it and a future to it. When you stay with the depression, there's no depression, there's just weight.

See, in the East, they somatize their problems. Here, we always psychologize it. You get a pain in the knee and it's deep anxiety. Whereas in the East, they just say it's a pain in the knee. So if they're depressed, they're not depressed, they just feel heavy. See? And there's a little escape from that. At least you don't identify so much with it.

And what we discover in our meditation is just by allowing it to express itself is the process of healing. It's as simple as that. And much cheaper.

And remember that we're not moving towards some sort of dead heart state, like the Buddha sitting under the tree, blank, with a sign, fully liberated, do not disturb. I mean, he ends up with the Buddha heart. So all these emotional states that we have, depression, loneliness, anxiety, when they come up, that energy is not dissipated, it transforms, it sublimates.

As I understand sublimation in science, it is a solid which moves directly into a gas without an in-between. So, although we have ice, water and vapour, it seems though if you have something which goes from solid to vapour immediately, they call that sublimation. That's exactly what's happening all the time. As soon as you sit with your depression, or your anxiety, and you're feeling it, and you're staying with it, and you're holding it and embracing it in loving kindness, affectionate awareness, it feels as though it's evaporating, right? After a time, of course.

And that is changing into its opposite immediately. And you know that because the next time you behave, there's a change of behaviour, even if only small. So where there was hatred, you find love, where there's cruelty, compassion, selfishness, generosity, loneliness, solitude. Happy days are ahead of us.

So a lot of this is about using language to make the state objective out there and constantly returning to that practice, would you say?

It's in the technique that I personally teach, which is taught by the Mahāsi Sayadaw of Burma, we do use a noting technique to make that distance obvious. But that is only a technique. It's not so much to do with language as an inner position that you take. See, I mentioned catching your finger in the door. See, for one moment, you and the finger are one. You become a physical self. And then you jump out of that and you become the angry self and start kicking the door.

So this sense of self is always moving. It's always changing. It's always catching hold of something. What is it that is falling into this identity? Buddha. It's the satipaṇṇā, the awareness. It's the Buddha within that's suffering. The body doesn't suffer. It just has pain. The heart doesn't suffer. It just has emotions. The mind doesn't suffer. It just works. What's suffering is the Buddha within. That's why we're trying to get out of it.

You're all looking at me very seriously. You're beginning to feel I'm saying heretical things.

Can I ask, do you mean by the Buddha within? Is that an awareness of the fact that we can get out of it? Is that the Buddha within?

The Buddha within refers to the quality of intuitive awareness. These are not two different faculties. They're two sides of the same coin. First you look and then you see. But for it to be active, there has to be a desire to know.

Could you take us through a little process of, for example, I've been just now, based on what you've been saying, working with a certain issue to try and release the Buddha within. So there is grief. I'm grieving, so there is grief. And then I feel disloyal in a way because I'm not grieving anymore. So then I say there is disloyalty. And I'm sort of free of that, and then somehow I'm... stuck.

Yeah, I'm not sure where I am.

Right, okay. Well, first of all, in this particular case, our confusion is between sorrow and grief. Sorrow is the resonance within our own hearts of somebody else's suffering. Grief is the measure of our attachment. So when somebody dies or somebody leaves us, it's like something just ripped out of our hearts and we're just left with this sore. And then if we think that that is a measure of our love, then how can we stop grieving? Because every time we stop grieving, we think we've stopped loving. We get into a double bind.

So once we realize that the grief I'm feeling is something personal to me because of the relationship I had and there's nothing to do with love. Love is very easy. Love lets people die. It's not a problem. Love lets people leave us. But grief doesn't. Grief hangs on.

And so we sit with the grief, not confusing it with love, love denied, but seeing it as the product of attachment, which means, attachment means we are psychologically dependent on something outside our control for our happiness. Once you begin to realize that, it's a no-goer. You just don't invest in bonds that aren't going to work.

So, you observe the grief, and the grief, and the heart will heal itself. It may take a week, a month, nine months, it doesn't matter. The heart will just slowly heal itself. I had a particularly interesting case of that, of an elderly woman who came saying that she'd been grieving for her son for five years. And this was exactly what she was doing. She was grieving, and every time the grief went, she felt guilty that she no longer loved her son. As soon as this was pointed out to her, she was back the next week saying all the grief had gone.

There is an end to grief.

You do get like an emotional, it has an emotional sort of scar as well, doesn't it? You can see a photo, the grief can come back, or you can just remember something, the grief comes back.

Yeah. Yeah, but hopefully, eventually, there's just the memory of joys. I mean, you counterbalance that with gratefulness, gratitude, that, you had a lovely relationship. Even if it was a terrible relationship, you're grateful for the teachings.

Yes, that's it. It's called Tough Love.

I was quite interested in what you were saying about the difference in the way that we look at emotional, psychological, we call them psychological problems in the West, of depression, anxiety, trauma, whatever, and that it's experienced more as a somatic sensation. Do you think there is working with feelings in the body rather than the cognitions is actually quite helpful when you're meditating?

When something happens to us, say, just a very simple thing, somebody says something that irritates us. So all that's happening is that we can see their face and their attitude towards us. We hear the coarse words or the words that they want to be painful to us. That's all. We might feel at the heart level, at this sort of surface heart level, the vibration of their anger. That's all. The rest is completely manufactured by me. So if I now allow anger to arise against that, that's been manufactured by me.

So, all these emotions that we feel, the depression, the anxiety, etc., have not been directly caused by someone else or an event. There is nothing in the world, or anybody in the world, who can actually cause me psychological suffering. If it were true that other people could cause me psychological suffering, how could I have ever been liberated? By getting rid of you? It's the very fact that all the suffering I have is caused by me, that the liberation is possible here and now. See?

So now, if all this anger in me, just staying anger in me, is not caused, I'm still left with the conditioning of anger. It remains in me like a red hot balloon. And it seeks objects. I can get angry with anything. It just depends whether this is coming to the surface or not. And that's why a lot of our anger is inappropriate. When you go home and your partner or husband has not done something, you can really burst out in a huge amount of anger. But if it's your boss, you've got to swallow it. You've got to keep it down.

When you consider that there is this ball of anger, which has nothing to do with past, present and future. It is a present conditioning within us, which has, of course, its own inner conditioning of triggers. Certain things make us more angry than others. Our problem is to release the anger as feeling, because all it is, is energy. And it's in sitting within the bonfire, with, of course, affection and kindness, that the process of healing happens. You don't have to do anything in the outside world.

If in your meditation you're working with some sort of emotional pain, and you're sat there, and suddenly a memory comes up, which seems to be the point where this whole mental conditioning arose, it can be a vehicle through which there's an escape for that particular suffering, and it can be a healing moment, right? So a traumatic moment. But you can't make that come. That has to come out of the psyche, out of the mind.

Sometimes you get pain in the body, which you know is emotionally based, it's not physical, and you sit with it, and sit with it, and sit with it, and it disappears, and you haven't a clue what it was. You might intuitively think that it was anxiety, but you don't know. All you know is that there was discomfort and pain in the body. But then when it's gone, you know that something's left and you feel the lighter and better for it. And it's when you have those sorts of experiences that you realize that actually the heart heals itself. All you have to do is get out of the way.

But it can't do it without expressing its disturbances within your awareness. Until it does so, it's stuck within the frame of this psychophysical organism, a phrase I particularly like. Does that make sense?

Yeah.

Could you tell us a little bit about yourself, how you've arrived to where you are? Where you started.

Well, it's really boring. Boring to you.

Yeah, it's just me. It's just boring.

Could you start with your name?

Ah, my name. Bodhidharma. Bodhidharma. Yeah, well, that was given to me. That's given to you by your teacher, you see, when you ordain. And he knew I had a Zen background, so I think it's a bit tongue-in-cheek.

In the ordination... in the way of naming monastics, it's taken on the day of your birth. And it follows, the days of the week follow the alphabet, the Sanskrit or Pali alphabet. So the first day would be the vowels, A, E, O, U, see? And then it would start at the back with G, K, V. Well, on Wednesday, which is on Wednesday's child, it's M and V. So you didn't have much of a choice. So he ends up with Bodhidharma. And as you know, he's the great Indian who went to China and started the whole Chan tradition. And was, for some reason, named after me. So you just get your name like that. It's not that you can't change it.

I have a rather interesting story of a Dutchman who was ordained and was given the name of one of the companions of the Buddha. The companion of the Buddha was called Whopper. When he finally copped on to what it meant, he was almost sniggering. Fancy being called Whopper! He changed his name. So you're not stuck with that. Actually, the proper pronunciation should be Whop, but it doesn't fit the robe, you know.

As usual, like a lot of people, I came into meditation because I wasn't happy. I began way back there in a state of unhappiness seeking happiness, and I decided to go to Japan to do some meditation. So I wrote to the Buddhist Society in London and said, "Can you give me some idea or some direction on how to get to Japan to do some meditation?" They sent me a letter with 21 points—I wish I'd kept it—as to why I shouldn't go. Then they said there was a monastery just up in Northumberland, Throssel Hole Abbey, and they pointed to a teacher who was in Birmingham, Badgero, who lived just a little bus ride away.

I remember the first meditation, which was so Zen. The zendo was very cool, and she had this sort of tough look about her. She had me kneeling, facing the wall. Her instructions were, "Watch whatever comes up." So I sat there and tried to watch whatever comes up. All I can say is, at the end of 45 minutes, I just knew this was going to get me out of my problems. Within six months I had a job, I bought a house, and I was steering clear of relationships after the former disastrous one. I was giving myself a break.

By then I was living in Birmingham, and there was a Burmese monk there—some of you will know him, Bhante Rewata Dhamma. Vajira said, "Why don't we go and visit him?" So I went over to visit him. He had a PhD in Abhidhamma. I thought I'd quiz him, and I said, "Bhante, what is your understanding of neurosis?" He looked at me and said, "What is that?" I thought, "Well, I can't believe it. Here I am lying about neuroses, and it's all wash away."

Anyway, I was still drawn, and I had my first Theravāda retreat with Ajahn Sumedho, Venerable Sumedho. It was very different. Although it's the same observation process, Zen kept me out of the five sense doors and was extremely good at daily life practice. It really did change my life. I even took dukkha up there, became a Buddhist there after two years. But in the retreat I did with Ajahn Sumedho—my first one—closing my eyes and going inward was a massive revelation. I thought, "This is it, I'm really actually investigating myself."

Shortly after that, Mahāsi Sayādaw came. I missed his first visit, but on the second visit, I did a retreat with Sayādaw Janaka. I just knew this guy was the beef. So I determined to go out there, and I took a sabbatical from work and spent six months with him in Burma.

Then I came back, and this awful thing began to scratch on my mind: what I really needed, what I really wanted to do, was dedicate myself to the practice. The only way you could do that was to become a monastic, because the institution is there for you to do that. I resisted it, and then after about a year, I just went to Dr. Rewata Dhamma and said, "Bhante, I want to become a monk." He said, "You're too old." I thought, "Thank God for that."

So I went off, but he just wouldn't let me go. I came back again about six months on and said, "No, Bhante, I think I really would like to ordain." Then he said, "Well, no, you're necessarily here," because by then I was doing a little teaching and was very much part of the fabric of the vihāra. I cut the lawn, for a start. So again, I felt this sort of relief—oh yeah, right, okay. But unfortunately, he just wouldn't leave me alone.

I went on a two-week personal retreat in Wales, and I was really quite sure that's what I wanted to do. When I came back to him again, he said, "Okay." So I ordained in a very exotic place, which is Birmingham. From there, I went to Amaravati. I stayed there for about a year. I wanted to get myself to Burma, but all those terrible things happened in '89, so I was quite marooned, really, in Thailand, not knowing what to do or where to go.

I kept meeting monks who said, "You want to go to this Mahāsi centre in Sri Lanka." I'd never even heard of it. When I got there, there was this little hut and a nice little garden. The abbot gave it to me, and I sat there off and on for eight years.

Then I came back because I didn't feel well. I had a contract, we can say, with the then head of the London Buddhist Vihāra, Dr. Vajiragnana. The idea was that I would stay there for the rainy season and just quietly meditate and whatever, then decide what to do. During that time, the monk who was teaching meditation left and got married. So I got plonked onto the podium, and the teaching began. I resisted it—I didn't want to teach at all.

So it grew, and then in the year 2000, I went on a retreat with Sayadaw U Pandita in his monastery. It's funny, isn't it, how things happen? But it was really quite a koan, to put it in a Zen way, this teaching business. There was something in me—I really didn't want to do it. I was there for about two months, and at the end of the retreat, I just went into the library. You know A Course in Miracles? So here I am in Rangoon, in a Buddhist library, and there's a sliver of a book that catches my eye about teaching, which are all the quotes from A Course in Miracles as to why you should teach. So I read that and I knew I should teach. It's weird, isn't it?

I came back and established a little place in North London, which was an utter and complete catastrophe. I had to get out quick. While I was up there, one of the people retreating with me was a man called Peter Merriam, who was very friendly with the Batchelors. He knew Stephen well, it seems. So he knew my predicament now—what am I going to do? I'd even contemplated leaving the Order. So he wrote to Stephen and told him that the next cosmic Buddha was in North London.

It was just one of those lovely, fortunate positions where they'd left Gaia House and Yanai and Christina were holding the place with all these personal reasons, and they needed somebody to help. I stayed there, as some of you know, for four years. During that time, it became obvious to me that there were enough people around who wanted to do the real McCoy—the full-on get up at half past three, go to bed at ten, wallop. I thought, "Well, there's a place there for a niche within a niche."

So we began a little trust, and we've ended up on the borders of Wales. I only take eight people on a retreat, and only eight people come. It's all right. It exists, and it continues. And you're all invited. That's where I am at this present moment.

"How long is the retreat?" A minimum of a week. But during summer, I do a roll-on, roll-off eleven weeks period. People come for various lengths. There are little retreats throughout the year too—week-long retreats.

"Do you really have to get up at half past three?" Half past three is a wonderful time. Well, it's like anything else. After the first two days, when you get up a little later—five o'clock—you can feel the effects of the meditation. So getting up at half past three is a bit of a struggle, but on day four, definitely by day five, one feels completely refreshed. Lots of energy. People cry by day seven—they just don't want to leave.

"But that's only five hours sleep?" Five and a half hours. It's enough. And then, of course, people who stay long term, even after about seven days when they're used to that level of sleep, I push them back to four hours. They're fine with it. Very few—only one or two have not been able to take that and come back to five and a half hours. You'd be surprised how much energy we have.

"And when you're running a retreat at Gaia House, do they get up at half three?" Yeah. Really? Yes, all week they've been up at half three. The first two days it's five o'clock, and then they're up. Yes! Twenty-five people, up at half past three till ten o'clock. Mind you, there were one or two laggards. One has to be...

That's it. Thank you so much. I shall ring the bell. We won't pūjā now.
