Namo tassa bhagavato arahato sammā-sambuddhassa (three times)

Homage to the Buddha, the blessed, noble and fully self-enlightened one.

I'm trying to make a distinction, or trying to talk about the two types of meditation that we find in all forms of Buddhism: samatha and vipassanā. Samatha means peacefulness, quietening. Vipassanā means insight. And I think to get an angle on it, it's always good to go back to the Buddha's own personal experience and how it comes across to us through the scriptures.

So here we have a young man, he's in his mid-twenties, and he's slowly becoming disillusioned with life. He's living the good life, he belongs to a ruling family. Although in later commentaries he's put up to this huge eastern potentate, he's just a local boss, a local head of a tribe who actually has to pay tribute to the king of Kosala. So he's what you might call upper middle class. And he has a wife and an ordinary family life, extended family life, lots of cousins, many of whom of course join him when he starts the order, and of course the women join him eventually, just about the time his son is born.

From a psycho-dynamic point of view, from our Western psychology viewpoint, it's rather interesting that his own mother died when he was only a week old. And that must have had some psychological effects on him, even though it was his mother's sister who became his stepmother. And somehow he leaves just as his child is born. That's a rather interesting coincidence of facts, I'm sure. Freudians or Jungians might say something about that. I don't know.

But one perhaps could say that this trauma even at that young age, the loss of your mother, does create I think some imbalance in the psyche which begins to manifest in him in his early twenties as what we would call an existential crisis, leading to probably an identity crisis, who knows. And what brings it about is the realization, a sort of sudden growing realization that once youth has passed, once you've come out of the fantasy of youth where things like sickness, old age and death are very far away, one isn't concerned with these things anyway, concerned with good living. But around about twenty-five there is a change of view, something happens within us, most of us anyway, where we realize that in fact youth is passing as we know it and we're looking ahead to a glorious, hopeful middle age, we start taking things seriously, we tend to take our pensions, get married, take a career, away from the easiness of youth.

So within that context he comes to realize that actually in the end there's just sickness, old age and death, and it's a crisis which builds up in him to such a degree that it makes him go, it makes him leave.

But there's another side to it, which also reinforces that search, is that he's experienced what Blake would call the road of excess. I think that's how he puts it: the road of excess leads to the palace of wisdom. At some point when he's had all his parties and he's had a good time, he sees the vanity of it, he sees the other side of it, the emptiness of it. It's expressed in a visual sense that he wakes up at the end of a big carousing and just sees these dishevelled bodies and maybe the smell of sickness and who knows what, and that gives him the other side of pleasure, the downside of pleasure.

Psychologically, remember, this indulgence brings about the frustration when you can't get what you want, the grief when you lose what you've got, and the anxiety when you've got what you've got and you're afraid to lose it. So all that psychology is in there. And we can say that he was waking up to that fact that the life he was leading had this deeper emptiness to it. One could say that he hadn't found any real purpose in the family life that he was leading, in the career that was being offered to him as a kshatriya, a warrior caste, a ruler. And so there comes this crisis point. We know about crisis, we know about financial crisis. He's having a psychological crisis. And so he leaves.

Now he wouldn't have left if he didn't have somewhere to go. And the thing was that just as in the seventies there was a great movement of hippies searching for love, in those days there was quite a movement of people searching for the answer to life in the Hindu, what we call Hinduism, the Vedas. There was this slow growing new literature, the Upanishads, which manifests this questioning of the age. It was also an age of change in the culture, movement away from pastoral societies dotted here and there with local rulers and things like that, to a city-based civilization in which there grew a merchant class which had not been there before, a rich merchant class that began to have power and kingship, which the Buddha didn't particularly like. He preferred the more democratic meetings of the pastoral societies.

So there's ferment, there's change happening in society, not perhaps as vicious as we've experienced, but definitely some dislocation going on. And there were these groups of men, very rare for women to do it because of the dangers involved and of course the sexism involved too, who went out into the forests and tried to find the meaning of life. That was their job. And one of the strains of understanding which empowered them was the belief in rebirth, the belief in reincarnation.

And there were many answers to it, but it was the horror of having to be reborn again into this life. Remember, these times are a bit harder. There's no videos, there's no DVDs, there's no cars. I mean, it's dog work. You're out in the field digging and you come back, what do you do? The only entertainments, you might say, were the occasional big entertainments, the occasional military parades. And believe it or not, the holy men who would turn up in their parks, in their shrines, and everybody would go out on a full moon night and ask questions and they'd do some chanting and stuff like that. That was, in a sense, the fullness of their entertainment, I suppose, apart from the usual things, playing games.

And the idea that one had to be reborn again and again and again and go through this horror, because in those days, of course, sickness, old age and death wasn't something that happened in hospitals or was shut away somewhere. The dead were taken to charnel grounds. You could see the bodies rotting. When the wind changed, you knew where it was coming from. It was there, it was in the open, as you might still see in India. When you go there, that's one of the great things about India: it doesn't disguise these things. So this whole idea of having to come back to this, again.

So one was looking for an escape, where was the escape? And that was the atmosphere which the Buddha left home in. And I dare say that when he left, he didn't say, "I'm off for good." He said, "Well, I'm just nipping off for a little while and checking this thing out, see if I can find an answer to my deep sense of disturbance."

I remember when I told my mother that I was going to become a monk. She collapsed into such a deep weeping, came from the deepest part of her heart. Even I started crying. So I gave her a hug and said, "Mum, it's only for three years." And she stopped like that. And of course, you have to put it in the context of Catholicism because priests are around, you can see a priest there. But if you become a monk, that's it. You cut your tie. You enter the monastery. And nobody ever sees you again. I think they've softened up on that now. I think they can see people once a month or something. But in the old days, that was it. Left.

So I dare say there was a lot of gnashing of teeth. His parents wept, in later tales they say how his parents wept at his leaving, his wife wept, everybody wept. And I'm sure he said, "Well, I'm only going, I'll be back in a bit." He's going to see what it's like.

So he goes off and joins these ascetics living in the forest. And the people he goes to, the first two teachers, teach him what we now call the jhāna, what we now call absorption meditations. And when you practice this samatha type of meditation, you're creating a state of mind. But the beauty of it is that although you begin with an outside object, either a candle flame, you all know that, or a circle, or an inner object like a mantra, or an inner object like your breath, it's still an object. You're only using it to bring about a certain laser quality to the mind.

And I think you'll know that when the mind begins to concentrate, bliss arises naturally. It's just the quality of the mind as it concentrates, a sort of energy in it, and we experience it as a certain type of inner happiness. And the first teacher really took him right through what we now recognize as the jhānas, the rūpa jhānas and the arūpa jhānas. Now the rūpa jhānas are those states that you get by deepening your concentration until, as it were, the mental state leaves the body, goes inward as it were, and finds its own joy, and then even leaves that to find a perfect peace. This is not the equanimity of the seven factors of enlightenment. They use the same word, you see. These words are used variously. The same word, but they have slightly different meanings.

And then, leaving that, as it were, one enters into a stranger place where there's no object at all. So right up until that point, there's always an object: a light, the feeling, a sense, there's something there. But when that disappears, and this consciousness, as it were, if I want a better word, flips into a different state and there's nothing there. And those places are called infinite space, infinite consciousness, infinite nothingness. These relate, I'm talking now to people just a little bit who know the Dharma a bit deeper, these relate to the four khandhas.

So when you're into that area of space of nothingness, it's out of that nothingness that the saṅkhāra arises, the manifestations of mind arise. When you're into that space of consciousness, you're at the beginning of the viññāna process of consciousness which manifests eventually as one of the aggregates. When you're in the space everywhere, there's just space, you're at the subtle level of vedanā, feeling. And when you're at neither perception nor not perception, that's the beginning level of perception as that consciousness descends into the mind and finally coagulates into what we call physical body.

So that process that a person might go through, it has its own insightfulness as you pass through it. And the Buddha took this with his teacher and became an adept, and the teacher said, "Please join me." And he said, "No." He said, "Although I've done all this and they're very blissful states and all that, but it's not really answered my question as to is there an end to suffering."

Now that's the core thing which I should have mentioned earlier. The quest was: is there an end to suffering? And that eventually puts his whole teaching just in three words in the texts: dukkha, dukkha nirodha, suffering and the end of suffering. This dukkha, of course, has a very wide meaning. Here I've translated it as suffering, dissatisfaction, sense of lack, meaninglessness. It's the whole gamut of human suffering, from the smallest little disturbance to the deepest despair and horror.

So he leaves that teacher and he finds another one who takes him just one step further than these arūpa jhānas and there becomes an adept, and again he's asked to teach, but he says no, he leaves. So although he's practiced these concentration meditations, although he's taken them to the fullest development recognized by his own teachers, there's just something lacking. There's something which has not been undermined, which is still causing him suffering, causing him some feeling of dissatisfaction.

So now he tries a different tack, which seemingly he gets from an elder teacher, a contemporary teacher, the Nāgantha, the leader of the Jains. Now his understanding was that bad kamma was accrued even when he didn't mean it. So you know that Jain monks go around with a whisk and make sure that there's no bugs that they're going to tread on accidentally. So their understanding is that even accidentally, you still cause suffering, and therefore there's going to be a karmic comeback.

And the real problem lay, and this runs right the way through, really, Indian literature, in desire, trṣṇā. So one had to live the absolute ascetic life, deny the body any pleasure, because there was a danger. He did not seemingly make a distinction between pleasurable sensations and the attachment or desire that you have to them. So one had to, as it were, undermine that whole process. And if you think about it, no pleasures come through the body, don't they? So you begin to blame the body for your problems and you fast, you sit in front of very hot fires, you do all sorts of ascetic practices which are meant to steel you against the pleasure of the body.

So he took this again, he seemingly took it to his own personal end, like he couldn't go any further with it, and basically he just got thin. And he said he could hold his spine through his stomach, that's how thin he was. And again he wasn't achieving anything like, the question, this fundamental question about suffering, about meaningfulness, had not been answered. And he's with five companions, remember, at this time. They're going for it, helter-skelter, and they're really whipping themselves and getting into it big time. And so he leaves.

So now, in the opening stanzas of his very first talk, he says that the life devoted to sensual pleasure is base, ignoble, waste of time, leading nowhere. And the life devoted to self-mortification, which is not renunciation. Renunciation is not doing something to see your attachment. Self-mortification is based on self-punishment, self-negation in that bad way, rejection of life as it is in a way. And that self-mortification was also just painful, he said, and led nowhere. At least the first one was pleasant and led nowhere, but this was just painful and led nowhere.

But he doesn't say that the jhānas, that the other stuff that he learnt about developing the qualities of mind, was a waste of time. And that becomes part of his system. But we can, at least I can, get a sense of his despair when he leaves his companions and what's he going to do? He can't go home because it would just go back into that emptiness, that bad emptiness. He's been to all these teachers, he's talked to a lot of people, and you can see from his teaching that he knows all the local philosophies of the time and the psychologies of the time. He's learnt that and he's tried everything and he's got nowhere to go.

So I imagine that when he sat on that road along which Sujātā came, he was in a state of real existential despair and thin. And when Sujātā comes along with her rice pudding, or well rice cakes, she takes pity on this man. I mean, in the scriptures they soup it up. She's going to offer this to a god and sees the Bodhisattva who is resplendent and believes that this is the god. But actually, he must be looking miserable. She thought, well, maybe he needs it more than this god. And we all know the salvific effect of rice pudding. It's enormous in its power.

So having tasted it, he feels better, and around about that time he has this memory of his father doing plowing ceremony. He's a child, and there's something about the way he remembers, there's something about the way he's looking at his father doing the plowing ceremony which offers him another way of seeking the end, seeking the answer to his predicament.

And that's why I've got these pictures. The little baby at the back there on the board was on a poster, was on an advert in Birmingham Station. And I came out of the train, I saw this. It was part of an advert, and I went home and came all the way back to Birmingham station to take that picture.

I'd probably broken some sort of publication rights, but I thought it was fantastic. Make sure you have a look at that, because what it expresses is that way of looking and the moment of seeing.

The little girl in the other picture was given to me by a friend in Dublin, Dennis. This is a picture that brought into the Dublin time, the Irish time. There was an opening of this nature reserve, where they put trees and little animals. You can see that she's reaching out to a plant to see what there is there, but the look on her face, if you look at it, has both an intense interest, but also a sense of trepidation, a sense of fear of the unknown — like if I see this, what will happen? So that comes first, and the baby face comes second.

Here's this child watching his father doing a praying ceremony, and there is a tremendous interest in what his father is doing. That interest draws him into an absorbed state. He's just looking. You see it in children, don't you? You see it when their jaw drops and their eyes become fixated, and you can't shake them out of it unless you give them a clip on the back of the head. That's it — that's the pure openness of that intuitive intelligence just receiving.

That's why I try to stress this quiet abiding, because there you drop your preconceptions, you drop your ideas, you drop your concepts, you drop your history, and you lay yourself open, just observing, feeling, experiencing what's happening right now.

So there was something in that looking which raised again, that encouraged him to have another go. He was so certain that this would actually be the answer that he makes a determination: he's going to sit under the tree and either die or find the answer to his existential problem of suffering.

He sits for six hours. There's an interesting moment which is worth pondering — the great doubt arises. I'm sure you've seen that posture of the Buddha where he's putting his hand touching the earth to ground himself, and Māra the evil one attacks him. Although it's put in pictures of all sorts of things attacking him, what it is is the great doubt. It's known as the moment of great doubt, and the doubt is: Who are you? Who are you to try and work this out? There's no single human being you know of — nobody's ever worked this out. Who are you? How come you've even started on this quest?

With it there comes the temptation of going back into the ordinary life, and that's what Māra is. Later on in Buddhism, Māra is put across as a sort of evil bit like the Christian devil, trying to kill you and do all sorts of bad things to you. But he's much more the tempter, and the god Māra is actually the chief of a most delightful heaven. So what he symbolises is the attraction of the sensual life.

It's interesting that when he touches the earth and the earth goddess appears, it's his perfection of generosity which makes him continue to sit. Now what is generosity? Generosity is doing something for somebody else. I presume that what came to him at that moment was that this wasn't just for him — this was for humanity. There wasn't a selfish thing that he wanted to get out of suffering. He wasn't trying to save himself. It was in the greater context that this was the question, and it was for the benefit of others that gave him that strength to sit there and continue that investigation. This is my own interpretation, by the way. The commentaries just say it was the quality, the perfection of generosity that gave him the strength.

So when he began to teach, he taught these two things in tandem. The absorption states were something that he really pushed, because the thing about the mind is that if it's very concentrated, very open, very still, obviously it sees something. Obviously it's more capable of seeing something, rather than a mind that's scattered, unable to be gathered onto a single point. One can develop that sort of single-pointed mind through various exercises, and you can do it just by repetition.

But remember that when you do that, there's a tendency to be able to block, to stop the purification process, and that's what the Buddha found. When he was in these beautiful states — fine — but when he came out again, he was still the same old depressed Gotama. It hadn't done anything to purify the heart. It had built another mindset which, as an adept, he could enter any time. So therefore you could always go to this place when he felt a bit depressed — push it away, do your mantra, in you go, blissed out. But it never actually dealt with this problem.

That's what he came back to, and it can't do, because these jhānic states are about developing the mind. We see this, and this is the distinction between a charismatic who is not wise and somebody who is wise, and somebody who is charismatic and wise. Somebody who's charismatic builds up this huge love, and it can become a radiance. You can be attracted to it, and then one day you stand on their foot and they go berserk. That's why the Buddha says you can't tell how wise somebody is until you live with them for quite some time, and then you suddenly see these little defilements, these little odd bits of behaviour come out, and you know that something has not been purified.

That doesn't mean to say that in that charismatic form the person might not be doing a huge amount of good, but even that person may be confusing their charisma with wisdom. The great enemy, the Buddha points out, of the leader are the followers, because they keep telling you how wonderful you are.

The person who is fully liberated might not be charismatic at all — might be quite an ordinary person. Even though the Buddha definitely had some charisma, there's a lovely moment in the scriptures where somebody — a monk comes in, or it might have been a lay person, I can't remember — comes into a group of monks and has to ask which one is the Bhagavān. So it's not as though he displayed this huge charisma, or it doesn't seem to have done. But then again, you can have somebody who is charismatic and who is fully liberated.

Now what the jhāna does, all these jhānas, is to produce charisma, depending on what you practice. So if you practice love, that's the charisma you'll get.

In my travels in Thailand, I met about three or four, five people really — five monks, because you only get to see monks as a monk — who were all highly developed, and all of them were generally considered to be liberated. They all had very different atmospheres around them.

The two I remember most: one is Ajahn Sim who lived just up beyond Chiang Mai. There were three of us — we were travelling together, a couple of Americans. When you sat in his presence, you were immediately drawn into his sense of peace. It was a tangible feeling, and it immediately affected you. You sat in peace, just like that.

When I went to Ajahn Tate, who had this beautiful monastery up on the borders of Laos, on the Mekong — I went to see him, it was just me at the time, I think — you were just enveloped with this very lovely loving-kindness. He might just have been feeling that at the time, I don't know, but it was tangible. It was a real tangible feeling, and immediately softening. Immediately you felt this open friendship. When he died, something like — I don't know what they said — a couple of million people turned up to the funeral. He was pretty famous, Ajahn Tate. He's the one I quote, by the way. When I do a day of resolution on the retreats: "Make it simple, take it easy, stay with the one who knows." That's Ajahn Tate. Make it simple, take it easy, stay with the one who knows.

Now, when the people began to join him, all the members — bhikkhus and bhikkhunis — they were people who'd left the worldly life. So therefore, what were you going to do? What do you do all day? Well, you haven't got to go to work. What do you do? You can't grow anything. You're not allowed to grow. You can't cook. You don't have any money. You can't buy anything. You can't get into retail therapy. What are you going to do? You've got to do something.

So these exercises, jhānic exercises, are specifically for those people who have time. If you find yourself, you have time, this is something you might want to practice. It's beneficial — it's creating beautiful states of mind.

But he was travelling once — this is later on in his teaching — out towards Kammāsadhamma, amongst the Kurus. It was a village of the Kurus, and the Kurus lived what we would now recognise as modern Delhi, that sort of area. He'd been there before. This is ordinary village people — people who look after cows and sheep and the fields. Just nothing technological. This is drawing water from the well, cutting wood, all that sort of stuff.

He'd been there before and he'd given them the teachings. When he turns up again, he's quite taken by how they're actually practicing the Dhamma. He says for a start there's no well talk, gossip around the well, and everybody was doing things mindfully and they were all practicing meditation. He was so moved by this that he gave this talk which is known as the Discourse on the Establishment or Foundation of Mindfulness, which is recognised as the jewel of the whole collection, because here he actually tells you how to become liberated. This is it — he puts it all together in one discourse.

He says it to these ordinary people in Kammāsadhamma. He doesn't give this talk to his monks or anybody. This for me is highly significant, because normally speaking he's going on about the jhāna and vipassanā — the one leads to the other, et cetera — and there are teachers who teach that now. But this is directed to lay people who haven't got the time to sit there and get into these blissful states. They've got a tent of family and all this sort of stuff.

It starts off by telling them clearly — and the word he uses is ekāyāna-magga, which means the one-way proceeding path, or the path that proceeds in this single way. The commentary normally puts that as opposed to the dvayāna, the two-way path, which is the combination of the samatha practice with vipassanā. That's his first words: ekāyāna magga. It's translated variously by authors, depending on their particular viewpoint.

So you'll see in Nyanaponika, in his really still the core book on meditation, The Heart of Buddhist Meditation, he says it's "the only path." That's a bit fundamentalist. Then there's these people who are friends down in Devon who translate Pali as a sort of hobby, and they call it "the shore path." But Bhikkhu Bodhi, who is the American monk who's the doyen of Buddhist studies, makes it quite clear that this ekāyāna means the one-way path as opposed to the two-way path, which to me makes a lot of sense.

So this is the one-way path for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow and lamentation, for reaching the end of suffering and discontent, for finding the true way, for the realisation of emancipation — namely the four applications of mindfulness.

When we practice vipassanā, there has to be included in it a certain concentration content. What the Buddha does is he pulls out for us seven factors which, developed, lead to this natural insight process. The first one is just this awareness, but it's right awareness. Right awareness always means the observation of the three characteristics, because that's where the delusion lies. It's seeing the impermanence, it's seeing how we indulge or resist what is happening, whether pleasant or unpleasant, and the quality of not-self.

This not-self is not a philosophical statement. The Buddha doesn't say there is no self. It's a teaching tool in which everything you experience you make clear to yourself is an object you're aware of. So if you're aware of something, it cannot be that which is aware.

Think of how as children we have begun to distinguish out of that mass of sensation the world out there — object relationship, I think they call it. How out of this mass of sensations — mother starts to loom, your first object, something separate from you separates out of the mass — until eventually you're quite clear that this is me and everything else is not me. All we're doing is taking that process inward and making the inner part of our experience as objective as this room is.

So this room has a body — walls, ceilings — and it has atmosphere. It's a mind. So it is the same within us. As we begin to push out, push away, objectify the inner world as we've done the outer world, that process is the process of detaching from it, undermining that relationship of it being me or mine. That's why we feel this process of liberation. That's why the Buddha says the taste of Nibbāna is freedom. It's the liberation from that wrong connection with what we're experiencing.

But this awareness has to be supported, and the split is between those qualities which are passive and those qualities which are active. When we practice this quiet abiding, we are practicing those qualities which are passive, which for us are not highly developed in our society. It's the active qualities which are developed.

Those passive qualities are calmness — just be calm, not to be excited all the time. Not to seek a sort of high level of energy, but to just bring ourselves to a real deep calm. Interestingly, that's linked with this interest, because interest can get excited. If you're interested in something, you can feel yourself getting all excited, but that excitement then becomes — that interest then becomes tainted with trying to achieve something, trying to see something.

Once there's a trying to see something, that self is taking over the process. So to see something at this level, one has to let go of the idea that I'm achieving it. There has to be this business of just having faith, a real confidence that there is within us that which will make insight without us trying. That's the abstraction, that's the taking away of this self which manifests as a sort of over-effort, a trying to see something. You won't relax and just let the eye look.

So tomorrow when you're wandering around the paddock or the garden or you go for a walk, just rest your eye on something and just watch the way the eye perceives. You don't have to try and perceive. Put a leaf in your hand, or just look at a tree, and just watch how the eye itself is perceiving. Stand back from that process, and then you gain confidence. "Oh, the eye perceives. I don't have to try and perceive."

So it's the same with intelligence. If we get out of the way, the intelligence works naturally, because that's the quality of intelligence. It understands, it perceives, it has insight. It doesn't think. This is the thing — thought is another process. The insight is immediate. You either see it or you don't see it.

Then there is this passive quality of a steadiness of attention — just the steadiness of attention, concentration, focus, just steadiness, just keeping the attention steady. That has to be coupled again with right effort. The effort is just to maintain the focus. You put too much effort and you start getting restless, you start getting a shaking, putting too much effort into it. Too little effort and the concentrated mind very quickly falls into sweet oblivion — sleep, because that's what happens when the mind's nicely concentrated. It's calm, and off you go.

The passive quality of equanimity—that's so difficult for us. In this sense, it's coming from a position of don't know, which means that you're looking at something, investigating something, without any preconceived ideas, preconceived notions that this has to be this way. Very difficult, because on one side we're being fed these three characteristics, and then we're told just look, forget about that, just look and see for yourself. And there's no prejudice in the sense that the heart isn't involved in any over-desire—it's a calm heart, you see.

All these factors we've talked about are natural to daily life. Everybody has these. What turns them into factors that lead to liberation is the investigation of the Dhamma. So these same factors would be—so we say, anybody involved in science or some active research—they're all the same sort of qualities that you need. But once you turn all that to investigating the Dhamma, which here it is, these three characteristics, then this leads to a change in the way that we relate to the world we live in. All that is within this discourse, you see. This is what he taught lay people.

And just as a little aside about the Mahāsi, whose picture you see here: after the Second World War, when Burma gained independence from us—oh pity—they had an elected prime minister, the only one unfortunately, because in 1963 there was the military coup, which they're still suffering from. A group of people were looking for a meditation teacher, and the Mahāsi was a well-known teacher up in middle Burma. They brought him down and set him up in a meditation centre, and by all tales it was a virtual immediate success.

He wasn't teaching jhāna absorption, for which you need time. He was teaching a direct path—it's Ekkaya no—and he created the parameters whereby people could move quickly. So it was great effort, as you know: sitting, walking, sitting, walking eighteen hours a day. But it was never to try and attain something. He was always trying to relax and to watch and to see, to explore.

So his effect on the local society in Rangoon was immediate. Eventually, it expanded so much that by 1956—which is not many years after—he's doing his first world tour around the East. He didn't come West, I don't think, for a while. So that's the specific place that the Mahāsi holds in the Vipassanā scene, you might say: that he teaches this Ekkayano Magga, this direct path.

So there we have it. What makes the Buddha an especially great person in the spiritual history wasn't just simply the amazing insight that he had, but also his amazing ability to get it across—to actually produce a systematic way and a systematic teaching which people can understand. And not just the intellectuals, that's the point: ordinary people, people of kalama sutta.

So I can only hope my words have been of some assistance. May you be liberated from all your suffering, sooner rather than later.
